In the spring of 2000 a robotic camera was lowered into these waters for the first time.

This has never been done, no one has ever been in the area at all with a remote-controlled camera.

The robotic camera's survey revealed many shapes and objects familiar to Molar including coral formations with right angles, arches, disks and straight shafts fused into larger masses that had the appearance of twisted wreckage.

Now when we have been able to go back and forth with a remote-controlled camera we can repeatedly see that these strange structures we are looking for are there.

They're not at one place but you see them again, and again, and again.

There are situations where you see something that looks like an axle, the hub, something that looks like a wheel and you say to yourself, this is not a coral reef, this is a coral growth on an artifact and that is what's different to me, when I compare [these to] corals at other locations around the world.

Since the earliest explorations of Nuweiba, one distinctive type of formation has often been identified on the seafloor, a slender table like structure sometimes standing on end, with a coral encrusted base, a straight shaft and a circular top.

It's a 90 degree angle, a right angle, between something that looks like an axle and the wheel.

You can see this in different varieties and it looks very different from normal coral growth and it is like a man-made structure with a coral growth on it.

In the midst of them Pontian photographed this circular object attached to what appears to have been a broken axle or hub.

This discovery was significant for two reasons.

Pontian had documented the coral and crusted form of a wheel with dimensions similar to ancient Egyptian artifacts directly across from the proposed Nuweiba crossing site.

Our find also provided independent confirmation of earlier evidence establishing wheel-like formations on both coasts of the Red Sea in accordance with descriptions in the Biblical record.

And the Lord looked down on the Egyptian army and he made the wheels of their chariots come off.
